At the café, Zoë set a résumé beside René's notebook. "The façade looks different in the rain," she said. André agreed, then turned back to a small map of the marché. They had promised to meet Anaïs at noon, near the old hôtel. A handwritten note offered crème brûlée and a warm welcome. The accents belonged to the words; removing them would change the source. When the clouds cleared, the group walked slowly toward the river, comparing the quiet street with the busy square they remembered from yesterday.
